This short saber was introduced in 1767, preceding the French Revolution, as a replacement for heavier and cumbersome swords like the fusilier's épée. It was instantly derided for its modest dimensions and nicknamed "Briquet" ("fire lighter") and the name stuck and became official in 1806.

Excelling as a close-quarters and melee weapon, the slightly upswept blade could be used for slashing, but because of its length and thickness it was also an excellent stabbing weapon. Napoleon's infantry units, artillery, grenadiers, NCO's and corporals traipsed much of Europe with this shiny cohort at their sides. This sword wasn't always involved with grisly work, it was also used as a field tool. And after a victory, it was perfect for opening Champagne bottles!

Distally tapered, it with leather scabbard with brass throat and chape. The blade is blunt, but you can sharpen it yourself.
